Association Health Plans: Why Shouldn't Small Businesses Have the Same Health Care Options as Big Businesses and Unions?

Dear Colleague:

On February 16, we introduced "The Small Business Health Fairness Act of 2005" (S. 406), a bipartisan proposal to lower the costs and improve access to health insurance for small businesses.

Over 45 million Americans are without health insurance, and 62 percent of the uninsured are either employed by a small business or dependent on someone who is. Workers in the smallest businesses that do provide health insurance pay, on average, 17% more for health benefits than workers employed by large companies. Alarming, this crisis is only growing worse. While health insurance premiums for small businesses increase at double-digit rates, choices for health insurance and benefits continue to decrease.

A GAO survey found high levels of market concentration among large insurance companies in the state small group markets. The five largest insurance companies combined have 75% or more of the market in a majority of states supplying information, and more than 90% market share in several of these states.

The Small Business Health Fairness Act of 2005 will create new national-based Association Health Plans (AHPs) that can help remedy this growing small business problem. AHPs will empower small entrepreneurs with the same tools that large employers and unions use to make health coverage affordable for working families with virtually no cost to the federal government:

- AHPs can reduce health insurance costs by 15% - 30% by allowing small businesses to join together nationwide to obtain the same economies of scale, bargaining clout, and administrative efficiencies now available to employees in large employer and union health plans;
- New coverage options for the self-employed and small business workers will promote greater competition and choice in health insurance markets; and
- Tough new solvency standards will protect patients' rights and ensure benefits are paid.

President Bush made his support for AHPs clear in his State of the Union Address: "To make our economy stronger and more productive, we must make health care more affordable, and give families greater access to good coverage. I ask Congress to move forward on association health plans for small businesses and their employees."
